The Genesis of Dub Music

Dub, a subgenre of reggae music, emerged in Jamaica during the late 1960s. It originated from the practice of dubplates, one-off acetates that DJs would create by isolating instrumental tracks or adding their own effects to existing songs. These dubplates were then played at sound systems, massive outdoor parties that became the heartbeat of Jamaican culture.

Pioneering sound engineers such as King Tubby, Lee "Scratch" Perry, and Osbourne "King Jammy" Ruddock experimented with these dubplates, pushing the boundaries of music production. They stripped back the vocals, leaving behind hypnotic rhythms, thunderous basslines, and mind-bending effects that created a distinctly ethereal and meditative sound.
