

New Deal Radio: The Educational Radio Project

New Deal Radio was a series of educational radio programs produced by the United States Department of the Interior during the Great Depression. The programs were designed to teach listeners about a wide range of topics, including history, science, and the arts.

The programs were produced by a team of educators and broadcasters led by Robert Saudek. Saudek was a former professor at the University of Wisconsin who had been working in radio since the early 1930s. He believed that radio could be used as a powerful tool for education, and he was determined to create a series of programs that would be both informative and entertaining.
