On July 4, 1991, Laurel was driving home from a church event when she was involved in a car accident. She was killed instantly. Her parents, Larry and Nancy Geiss, were heartbroken. They could not believe that their beloved daughter was gone.

In the wake of their loss, Larry and Nancy decided to create a memorial to Laurel that would honor her memory and celebrate her life. They commissioned a local artist, Bob Parks, to create a life-sized bronze statue of Laurel. The statue is based on a photograph of Laurel taken just a few months before her death. It depicts her standing in a field of wildflowers, with her horse standing beside her.

The statue was unveiled in 1992, and it has since become a popular destination for visitors to Tombstone. Many people are drawn to the statue's beauty and its poignant message of love and loss. The statue is a reminder that even in death, our loved ones are never truly gone. They live on in our hearts and in our memories.

In addition to the statue, Larry and Nancy Geiss also created a memorial garden in Laurel's honor. The garden is located next to the statue, and it is filled with flowers and plants that Laurel loved. The garden is a place of peace and reflection, where visitors can come to remember Laurel and celebrate her life.

Tombstone Laurel Geiss is a haunting and beautiful memorial to a young woman who was tragically taken from her family and friends. The statue and the memorial garden are a testament to the love and loss that her parents felt after her death. They are also a reminder that even in death, our loved ones are never truly gone.
