The Early Years

Moorehouse College was founded by Henry Lyman Morehouse, a white minister from New York, and a group of former slaves. The school was originally named the Augusta Institute, and its mission was to provide education to freed slaves. In 1879, the school was renamed Moorehouse College in honor of its founder.

In the early years, Moorehouse College faced many challenges. The school was poorly funded, and its students often faced discrimination. However, Moorehouse faculty and students remained determined to provide a quality education to their students.
